A film that certainly had an influence on me is James Cameron's "Avatar". The film follows the story of humans' interactions with native inhabitants of Pandora, a planet that humans want to use to get rare minerals since their own planet has been polluted and stripped out of its own soils. The main character is a man with an artificially created ~~second body~~ <sup>second body</sup> used for negotiations and communications with indigenous people. He eventually becomes attracted to them and sides with them against humans to protect Pandora ~~from~~ <sup>from</sup> destruction.

Set a war between technologically advanced people and people who are connected to nature, "Avatar" is an allegory on humans in reality having rough relationships with indigenous tribes and their culture and destroying territories they live on. Much to my amusement, the situation is shown from the perspective of both native Pandorians and humans, explaining their actions. So, it made me think more about such problems as extermination, cultural assimilation, and other flaws of globalisation.

The other interesting thing in the film that affected me is the fauna of Pandora, which was shown in an absolutely amazing way. Their appearance makes you think of how they live, and how they are affected, too, by the arrival of humans. In this way, the film reinforced my interest in nature, biology, and creature design.

In conclusion, I can say that "Avatar" made me more interested in the problem of cultural interactions and also inspired me to create my own imagined creatures. This film certainly influenced my attitude.
